Kipling in Vermont.

Senator Beveridge, apropos of fame, said at a Washington luncheon:

"What is fame, after all? Kipling, when he lived in Hawthorne, took a trip to Montpelier and the first evening he came down to the hotel diningroom he overheard this dialogue between two waiters:

"First Waiter—'Do you know who that is, George?'"

"Second Waiter—'No. Who is it?'"

"First Waiter—'That's the celebrated Kipling.'"

"Second Waiter—'What's he done?'"

"First Waiter—'Hanged if I know. Fish line, ain't it?'"—Chicago Post.

A STORY OF REAL LIFE

By WARRINGTON ABERT

Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.

Strange incidents have brought about marriages, but the strangest of all was that which served to unite me and my wife. If I hadn't opened a certain book on a certain day I should either have remained a bachelor or married some one else. Had I opened that same book a day earlier there would have been no such effect. I could not have opened it a day later, for I have never since been in the room where it was kept.

I was at the time curate of a church in a small but aristocratic town. My salary was $600 a year. I had heard stories of girls setting their caps for unmarried clergymen, but I saw no evidence of the truth of these stories in my own case. Most of the girls of the congregation were daughters of well-to-do, some of them rich, parents. Whether the girls did not encourage me because they were aware that I had nothing but my salary or because I was not especially attractive to them I don't know. The fact remains that I was not encouraged.

I thought at the time that my sermons were a trifle too heavy for their intellects. I was given to philosophic thought, and my thoughts found a vent in my homilies. I could see from the want of attention of these girls when I was preaching that they were thinking of the set of their garments, the appearance of their hats and such matters rather than of the ideas I was endeavoring to convey to them.

But there was one young lady whom I noticed fixed her attention upon me from the time I began to speak until I had finished. I would have been at a loss to know whether her interest was in my remarks or me had she not the moment I had concluded my sermon turned to her hymn book or her pocket-book for the collection, seeming to forget all about me. As she was the only young lady in the church with a fortune in her own right I never dreamed of marrying her, though she was rather good looking and a very estimable person.

Of course I had the entree to her home, and many a pleasant evening or afternoon I spent with her chatting upon subjects that were agreeable to me and seemed to be agreeable to her. She appeared to be pleased to start me talking and sat with some fancy work in her hands listening. At that time I supposed a man entertaining to women to be one who could talk well. I have since learned that a good listener would be his most dangerous rival. But the lady did not seem to care to talk herself, leaving me to do it all.

This kind of chat about ideas is a very poor conductor for any warming of the heart. Love is not intellectual. A rhinoceros may love, but a rhinoceros is not a thinker. Birds love, but they don't reason as to where they will build their nest. Instinct tells them how and where to do that. I never made a start on saying anything tender. To do so did not occur to me. A curate with nothing but a petty salary to make love to a girl with a fortune in her own right! I should expect to be turned out of the house and probably my pastorate at such presumption.

I received a call that would give me no more salary, but I considered the field a better one than the one I occupied. I wished to be a worker as well as a preacher. In the parish where I was there were few poor people and consequently little good to be done among those who most need, to my thinking, a clergyman. I accepted the call and the evening before my departure for my new field called upon the young lady who had shown so much appreciation of my intellectual endowments. I had some new and, as I thought, original points to bring up by which I hoped to leave a final impression.

In the midst of my presentation of my views my friend rose and asked to be excused for a few moments. I was a trifle put out, for I had reached an important turn in what I was saying. Since she did not return at once I cast
